

Mitochondria are tiny organelles found in the cells of most eukaryotic organisms, including animals, plants, and fungi, that generate energy for the cell through a process called cellular respiration. Mitochondria are often referred to as the "powerhouses" of the cell because they produce most of the energy that the cell needs to function, through a process that involves the breakdown of glucose and other organic molecules.